Precision on the floor.

Strategy in the boardroom.

How a healthcare equipment manufacturer broke out of contract dependency, entered new markets, and built a commercial engine as precise as its products — with Stralchemistry.

BACKGROUND

A mid-sized manufacturer of diagnostic and surgical support equipment had spent 15 years building a reputation for quality in the domestic hospital supply chain. Their products were in operating theatres across three states, their certifications were impeccable, and their manufacturing floor ran with the kind of discipline most factories aspire to. But the business was fragile in ways the founders hadn't fully confronted — revenue was dangerously concentrated in two large hospital groups, margins were quietly eroding under raw material pressure, and an opportunity to export had been circling for years without anyone pulling the trigger.

Stralchemistry was engaged to convert manufacturing excellence into commercial resilience.

PAINPOINTS

Four structural vulnerabilities sat beneath a surface of operational strength:

Dangerous client concentration

Two hospital group contracts accounted for 71% of annual revenue. A single procurement decision by either client could threaten the entire business - a risk the founders knew existed but had never formally addressed.

Margin erosion on core products

Raw material costs had risen steadily, but pricing to long-standing clients had remained unchanged out of relationship preservation. The most popular product lines were now the least profitable - and no one had mapped it until Stralchemistry did.

Export opportunity paralyzed

The company had received inbound interest from Southeast Asian distributors twice in three years. Both times, internal uncertainty about regulatory compliance, pricing and logistics had stalled the process before it began. The window kept opening - and kept being missed.

No commercial function

Sales was handled by the founders personally, supported by two relationship managers with no structured brief. There was no demand generation, no channel strategy, and no system for identifying or approaching new institutional buyers independently of referrals.

THE STRALCHEMY ENGAGEMENT

Stralchemy ran a 16-week commercial strategy engagement — the longest in this case study series, reflecting the complexity of building market access in a compliance-heavy, relationship-driven industry. The work spanned risk architecture, margin recovery, export market entry, and sales function design.

1. Client Concentration Risk Plan

Stralchemy mapped the full revenue exposure and built a 24-month diversification roadmap — targeting private hospital chains, diagnostic centre networks, and government tender programmes as parallel channels. A minimum viable outreach programme was launched in month one, running alongside existing client relationships without disruption.

2. Product Margin Restructure

A contribution margin analysis across the full product catalogue identified three high-volume, low-margin lines being sold below sustainable levels. Stralchemy built a phased pricing correction plan — grandfathering existing clients at current rates for 12 months while reintroducing products to new clients at restructured pricing. Gross margin improved 16 points without a single client lost.

3. Export Market Entry

Stralchemy conducted a rapid market assessment of Southeast Asian healthcare procurement patterns and identified Malaysia and the UAE as the highest-fit, lowest-friction entry points. A regulatory readiness checklist, distributor evaluation framework, and pricing model for export were built and handed over as an operational asset. The first distributor agreement was signed within five months of the engagement starting.

4. Commercial Function Design

A lean institutional sales structure was designed — two dedicated account development roles with defined territory mandates, a tender tracking system, and a relationship management protocol that freed the founders from being the sole commercial interface. The company could now pursue new business without the founders being in every room.

OUTCOMES

Risk diversified, business stabilised

Top client revenue concentration dropped from 71% to 38% within 14 months. Four new institutional buyers were onboarded - none through founder introductions.

Margins recovered structurally

Gross margin improved 16 points across the restructured product mix. The three previously underpriced lines were brought to sustainable levels - with zero client attrition during the transition.

Export revenue live

The first export distributor agreement generated ₹14.6Cr in its first full year - a revenue stream that did not exist 14 months prior. A second market entry is currently in the due diligence phase.

Commercial engine independent

The newly structured sales function closed its first three institutional contracts independently within six months. For the first time, revenue growth no longer required a founder in the meeting.

“We knew how to make products that met the highest standards. What we didn’t know was how to build a business around them that could survive without us.

Stralchemy bridged that gap - methodically and without disrupting what we’d spent 15 years building.”
