

Case Study · Real Estate · Established Business

Two decades of reputation.

One strategy to protect it.

How an established real estate firm reinvented its growth model without disrupting what had made it trusted for 20 years — with Stralchemy.

BACKGROUND

A second-generation real estate firm with 20 years of presence in the residential and commercial property market had built its business on relationships, referrals, and deep local knowledge. It was well-respected, consistently profitable, and completely stagnant.

Revenues had plateaued for three consecutive years. A rising competitor was gaining market share through digital-first strategies, while the founding family faced internal division — some advocating bold modernization, others cautious about disrupting a proven legacy.

Stralchemy was engaged to cut through the internal debate and build a strategy both sides of the family could execute.

PAINPOINTS

The diagnostic phase revealed that the firm's greatest strengths - its relationships and reputation - had also become its constraints:

Growth capped by referral dependency

Over 80% of deals came through personal referrals. The pipeline had no predictability - revenue tracked the founder's social calendars. There was no system to grow beyond the network they already had.

Broker productivity uneven

A select group of top-tier brokers accounted for the majority of revenue. The rest were underperforming due to the absence of accountability structures, training systems, or differentiated incentives. Talent was being wasted.

No digital presence or lead system

The firm had no CRM, no lead tracking, and a website that hadn't been updated in four years. Inbound enquiries were handled manually and inconsistently - hot leads went cold from slow response times.

Untapped high-value segments

The firm's portfolio and reputation were well-positioned for NRI investors and commercial lease clients - but neither segment had ever been formally pursued. Growth was being left on the table.

THE STRALCHEMY ENGAGEMENT

Stralchemy ran a structured 14-week engagement that respected the firm's legacy while building the commercial architecture needed for the next decade. Every intervention was designed to be adopted by a team that had operated on instinct for 20 years — not just by a founder who had read the strategy document.

1. Pipeline Architecture

Stralchemy designed a structured inbound and outbound lead system — a CRM implementation roadmap, response SLAs, and a tiered lead-scoring model. For the first time, the firm knew which enquiries to prioritise and which broker to assign them to. Referrals became one input in a diversified pipeline, not the whole engine.

2. Broker Productivity Framework

A performance tier model was introduced — not to penalise underperformers, but to give every broker a clear development pathway. High performers received stretch mandates and higher-margin deal access. Mid-tier brokers received structured coaching protocols. The result was a team that grew together rather than coasting behind its stars.

3. NRI Investor Proposition

Stralchemy identified the NRI residential investment segment as the highest-opportunity untapped market — high intent, low local competition, and a natural fit for a trusted legacy brand. A dedicated proposition was packaged: remote buying experience, legal handholding, and an end-to-end onboarding process. The first campaign was live within six weeks of the engagement.

4. Digital Presence Overhaul

A lean digital strategy was built — not to chase trends, but to ensure the firm's reputation was visible where buyers now search first. A refreshed website, a structured Google Business presence, and a content plan built around the founders' genuine expertise replaced the outdated static presence entirely.

OUTCOMES

Predictable pipeline, finally

Within 90 days of CRM go-live, lead response time dropped from 48 hours to under 3. Deal closure cycle shortened by 34% - driven by faster qualification and structured follow-up.

Broker team performing as one

Revenue per broker rose 47% in the first year of the new framework. Two previously underperforming brokers moved into the top tier within six months of the coaching programme.

NRI generating real revenue

The NRI proposition generated ₹9.2Cr in closed deals within its first two quarters - entirely from a segment the firm had never formally engaged before.

Legacy protected, growth restored

Year-on-year revenue grew 38% - the firm's strongest performance in a decade. The founding family resolved its strategic disagreement not through debate, but through results.

"We didn't need someone to tell us real estate. We needed someone to show us how to run a real estate business like it's 2025. Stralchemy did exactly that - without making us feel like we'd wasted the last 20 years."

Managing Director, Established Real Estate Firm
(Identity withheld at client request)

From Blueprint to Breakthrough — Act Now

→ stralchemy.com